

Frank Darabont left The Walking Dead as the showrunner six months ago due to unknown reasons, then it was up to Glen Mazzara(the second in command during Darabont's reign) to take over as the first in charge. Now with the show about to come back from a big hiatus this Sunday, Mazzara spoke with Vulture in a big interview, in which he discussed his early life and works, the transition to The Walking Dead, and what we can expect from the show with his leadership. But now, six months after Darabont left, with the first all-Mazzara episode about to air, can you say you have your own vision for the show? I do. I see it as a horror show, and that just means to me that it needs to be incredibly suspenseful. That suspense could come from interpersonal drama or it could come from the zombie scare of the week. I've really
