

Well that was one hell of a mid-season finale if you ask me. The Walking Dead may have its flaws from time to time, but this episode was so well crafted. They designed it so that you kept asking questions, and every time you thought you knew the answer, you were wrong. At least I was constantly guessing wrong, and I loved it. If you asked me if Shane would live to see another season, I would've said no. Then Shane and Dale are squaring off. The tension is as ripe as a strawberry in June. When the scene began I expected Shane dead, as the scene near it's conclusion I was sure that Dale was dead. Nope, and double nope, this should like I said before had me drawing false conclusions left and right. We heard earlier in the week that a member of the cast, loyal to Frank Darabont was
