

In the past year it was announced that screenwriter Seth Grahame-Smith and his partner David Katzenberg had been handed the task of resuscitating Beetlejuice. Touching such a beloved character had most fans very nervous. Most of us were expecting it to be another lame reboot, but in October the duo assured the fans that wasn't the case. They actually were planning on making a sequel, and more importantly wanted Michael Keaton back as the ghost with the most.

They also revealed that Tim Burton gave them the blessing, and now MTV has caught up with the zany director to get his thoughts on the potential project. MTV: Is it true that you're considering doing another "Beetlejuice" film? Burton: Yes. I love that character, and Michael [Keaton] is so great in it. I always think about how great and fun that character was, so I just said to ["Vampire Hunter" writer] Seth [Grahame-Smith],
