

So early today, Deadpool fans were shocked and surprised by the news that director Tim Millar had decided to step down from directing the 2018 sequel for the Merc of the Mouth, as we knew is that he left over creative differences with Ryan Reynolds, but we had no details as to what it was, but now we know, The Wrap has revealed that it concerned the casting of a certain fan favorite time traveling mutant. This is what the site had to say regarding the topic.

“We’re told the director was all set to make the sequel, which still doesn’t even have a release date. That’s allegedly in part because when Reynolds’ agents renegotiated his deal, along with a massive amount of money, the star got casting approval and other creative controls. That whole process took more time than Miller (and fans) would have liked, and it shined a spotlight on differences in vision between the two key players. Miller, who owns

Read more: <https://www.comicbookmovie.com/deadpool/tim-miller-left-deadpool-2-over-the-casting-of-cable-a146229>