

The adaptation of the Japanese graphic-novel All You Need Is Kill has been in development for a while, with Tom Cruise interested in the main role for quite some time as well. Now, Variety reports Cruise has agreed to star in the movie, albeit there's no deal officially signed at the moment. Apparently, Warner Bros. Pictures President Jeff Robinov wanted a big star for the movie since the beginning, and despite the fact that the script had a younger actor for the role, like Joseph Gordon Levitt for an example, the studio decided to go with Cruise. The script has already been rewritten so that the character can match Cruise's age. Dante Harper was responsible for the initial script with Joby Harold working on the rewrite. Tom Cruise was so enthused about the script that he had director Doug Liman visit him in Pittsburgh, where the actor was shooting One Shot.
