

Sumit's adaptation of the seminal sci-fi novel Ender's Game is currently filming, and producer Robert Orci has updated the official production blog with two new images, featuring a look at the monitor implant on Ender's neck, and his room back on Earth.. Though Ender's world is one worth saving, it sometimes comes with a price. The novel was amazingly prescient about a great many things: remote controlled drone wars, the internet, the influence of blogging, hand held computing tablets like the I-Pad, and of course, electronic surveillance implants. Implanted tracking and monitoring chips are no longer a science fiction concept. They exist now. And one day, they may be as advanced as the monitor implanted into Ender, which allows Colonel Graff to "see through his eyes" and know: HE'S THE ONE. The more futuristic the world, the more invisible its technology. So why shouldn't Ender's room look just

Read more: <http://www.comicbookmovie.com/fansites/rorschachsrants/news/?a=58174>