

The Wrap reports that Warner Bros., the studio behind The Dark Knight Rises is torn on whether to cancel movie showings across the country after the senseless tragedy in Colorado. An executive reportedly told the site that "Warner was watching the situation and still considering whether to take further measures beyond cancelling the Paris premiere, including cancelling screenings at theater chains". Reported mere moments ago, opinions have already sprung up about whether WB should press forward or halt and re-release a few months down the line. Nothing has been decided at this point however. Personally, I think it should be pulled, at least for a week, until all the facts are gathered. UPDATE: E! reports that they contacted their own source at Warner Bros. regarding a possible cancellation of screenings who said, "he'd be 'shocked if that happened, but it's such an unprecedented situation.' The reports notes that the source was contacted
