

Word is that Warner Bros might be playing a bit of release date chess with two of their biggest movies yet. According to TMT Peter Jackson's Hobbit movies are not going quite to schedule and he may struggle to meet the December 14th release date for the first of the two prequels; "An Unexpected Journey". Apparently he is open to delaying the release until the following year which would allow Zack Snyder's Superman reboot to swoop in and reclaim it's original Christmas 2012 spot. From TMT.. One scenario we're hearing involves the studio moving The Man of Steel, the Christopher Nolan-"Godfathered" Superman revival with Zack Snyder wearing the director cap into that Christmas '12 slot. We've been told that production is flying as fast as the Big Blue himself with shooting to wrap early February, and scenes already being edited and sent out to various post-production houses as I type this. The site

Read more: http://www.comicbookmovie.com/fansites/rorschachsrants/news/?a=50844&t=font_color_redUPDATEfont_Will_We_See MAN OF STEEL Next Year After All