

Earlier this year, a rumour surfaced which claimed that a new Batman game was in the works from WB Montreal (the makers of the divisive Batman: Arkham Origins) which would put the spotlight on Damian Wayne, the Caped Crusader's son who currently serves as Robin in the comic books. It was then back in September than another report popped up which said that the game would be set a decade in the future with an older, broken Bruce Wayne who mentors Damian alongside Nightwing. At the same time, a Borderlands style Suicide Squad game was also said to be in the works for release next year, and as great as all of this sounded, we've yet to hear anything official about either of them. Whether or not they'll happen remains to be seen, but now a new video has popped up which appears to show WB Montreal employees working on an open world game starring Batman. That has since been deleted, something which
