

Hot off the heels of Warner Bros. officially announcing the sequel to the LEGO Batman game, it's now been announced that their other upcoming Batman-related video game, Gotham City Impostors, has been pushed back. No reason has been given for the sudden move, but the game will now be released on Xbox Live Arcade, PSN and PC sometime in February (instead of its original release date of January 10th). The video game is a first person shooter revolving two separate groups of impostors (one inspired by Batman, another inspired by The Joker), and is set in Gotham City. From Video Gamer: Gotham City Impostors, the downloadable, multiplayer FPS from FEAR developer Monolith, will now be released in February, Warner Bros. Interactive Entertainment has announced. No reason for the move from January 10 has been given. Check out the trailer for the game below, and be sure to check the game out when it
