

Talking to Canadian Business, studio head Martin Carrier and Reid Schneider, vice-president and executive producer of Warner Bros. Montreal have teased their upcoming plans for the mysterious superhero project they're currently working on with DC as well as commenting on the trend of increasingly unpopular and low quality video game movie tie-in's. "We're definitely working closely with DC on different titles, yet to be announced. It's one of the reasons we talk to Geoff Johns and Jim Lee [the publisher's head honchos] on a regular basis," revealed Carrier. "It's interesting for our geeky side to be in touch with those guys, especially now that they've relaunched all the 52 [comics]. It's a good time to be working with DC. There's so much energy going on there. So yeah, [we're in] the triple-A space and the casual online space. "If you look over the past decade of superhero games, there were two. The

Read more: http://www.comicbookmovie.com/fansites/JoshWildingNewsAndReviews/news/?a=50863&t=VIDEO_GAMES_Warner_Bros_Montreal_Tease_Upcoming_DC_Project_Won't_Be_A_Movie_Tie-In