

It's almost become mandatory to quiz actors and filmmakers about superhero movies these days, since so many seem to be dipping a toe in the genre - the thing is, fans don't always like the responses they give. During an interview with Loaded, John Michael McDonagh - director/writer of blackly funny fare such as The Guard, and outright depressing slogs such as Calvary - was asked whether he thinks there are too many comic book films being made after he mentioned Deadpool as being one of the only funny comedies that was released this year, and he wasted no time in going straight for the jugular. "I no longer watch comic book movies in cinemas, I got tired of them. I like to be on a plane and watch them on a really small screen while I am drinking, just to give them the level of attention they deserve. Comic book films are kids movies. Let's just come out and say it,

Read more: <https://www.comicbookmovie.com/other/war-on-everyone-director-john-michael-mcdonagh-says-cbms-are-made-for-a145870>