

The L.A. Time's Hero Complex nabbed an interview with Judge Dredd creator John Wagner. In the interview Wagner talks about how the character has progressed in the past thirty-five years since Dredd was created. He believes that Dredd has made some strides, and is becoming more rounded as a human being with each passing year. He may never lose his robotic like self, but he is now capable of saying he was wrong and apologizing for his mistakes when need be. That is a giant leap forward for a character that was originally thought of as more of a robot than a man. GB: The new film looks like a very different beast than the 1995 one — no Rob Schneider appearance this time around. Tell us three specific things about the project that make you optimistic. JW: The plot is about Dredd and his world. It's impossible to cover every
