

We're now exactly one year away from the release of Justice League (here's hoping Zack Snyder unveils something to mark the occasion a little later today), and while much of the movie remains a mystery, we do know that it will take us to Atlantis. While there, we'll meet both Mera and Vulko, with the latter set to be played by Willem Dafoe, an actor who is no stranger to the world of comic book movies. Talking to The Guardian, Dafoe confirmed that he'll return as the character in Aquaman and shed some light on how his role in that movie will differ to what sounds like a small cameo in Justice League. "Well, Justice League is very particular because it's an ensemble movie and my character is being introduced here in order to be a principal role in Aquaman," he told the site recently. "These films are a different experience. They have different responsibilities, different resources and different intentions. It's nice to

Read more: <https://www.comicbookmovie.com/aquaman/willem-dafoe-explains-how-justice-league-sets-up-his-role-in-james-wans-a146864>