

Earlier this month, it was revealed that Warner Bros. would be releasing the 48 frames-per-second version of The Hobbit: An Unexpected Journey in only select location across North America (there's no word on what they'll be doing overseas at this point). That's not good news for fans who don't live near a major city, but the studio reportedly want to be careful while judging the reaction to the presentation, especially after VERY mixed reviews at CinemaCon earlier this year. However, the good news now is that you won't have to pay extra to see Peter Jackson's highly anticipated return to Middle-Earth in the format this December. According to Showblitz, Warner Bros. expressed a desire for exhibitors not to charge even more on top of the already high 3D ticket prices and they have agreed. For now. It is unfortunately likely that this will change in future depending on just how widespread

Read more: <http://www.comicbookmovie.com/fansites/JoshWildingNewsAndReviews/news/?a=66171>