

The Hollywood Reporter has revealed that once he's finished working on Justice League, Zack Snyder will finally set his sights on The Last Photograph. The thriller is a small scale production which has been in the works since the mid-2000s, but after the filmmaker found success with 300, the rights lapped. He's now looking to get them back though after getting longtime collaborator Kurt Johnstad to pen the screenplay. That will however be getting a rewrite before production actually starts late next year. According to the trade, "Photograph centers on a war correspondent in Afghanistan who is the only one to survive an attack on a group of Americans. When a special ops soldier in search of a family member shows up, the two team up, with the correspondent hoping to score the story of his life." The original plan was for Snyder to immediately start working on Justice League 2, but that's apparently been pushed back to make room for Ben Affleck's Batman

Read more: https://www.comicbookmovie.com/justice_league/zack-snyder-will-direct-justice-league-2-but-its-been-delayed-to-a147425